

THE AMERICA I BELIEVE IN

As entrepreneur Malcom Forbes once said, "Diversity is the art of thinking independently together." This quote signifies one of the single, most important factors, that makes this country the greatest of them all. The America I believe in is one that expresses diversity in every signal shape and form while granting the equal freedoms and security to all.

The diversity this country fosters allows us to stand out from other nations and form a sense of integrity while being different. You see, the word diversity is one that proves everyone shares a difference, a difference that gives men and women the well-knowing of being unique in his or her way. Out of the vast amount of Americans, not one is exactly like the other. Our nation's promises of acceptance have truly been shown ever since her birth.

As a result of diversity, we may share different cultures, speak different languages, and worship different gods but we are still equally united under the American flag. This means that no matter our race, ethnicity, or beliefs, we are granted the same rights as any other would be. The Bill of Rights, the core of our nation, sets an example for others to follow. Directly in the first amendment, we are granted the freedom to speech, religion, press, assembly, and the right to petition. Other nations fail to enforce these 5 basic freedoms. This enables me and other fellow Americans to know we are unobstructed of our god given rights.

Furthermore, the security and protection for all that this country establishes allows me to know that I am safe every morning, that I can walk out the door without having to be fearful or scared of what to see. Our policemen and military are those who receive ever so little recognition but still strive to do what's best for this country, protecting those who are in danger and limiting possible inside and outside threats. Words cannot express how deeply appreciate I am of them.

For what I am saying is entirely true, I am glad to wake up in the morning knowing I am a PROUD American citizen. This nation, one built on the diversity that comes with freedom and security is a place anyone would want to live. This is the America I believe in. "Out of many," we are god's vision on Earth.
